

Love in Five Dimensions

Chasing romantic dreams can be a strange journey

Julian Bonser

David Jenner's life to date has been self indulgent, unproductive and uneventful, his greatest achievement having been to reach the age of 59. But all this is about to change profoundly - with dramatic consequences...

Never married, David lives alone in the old family home, still sleeping in the single bedroom he'd occupied as a child. Very much the archetypal 'grey' man, he'd easily pass you in the street unnoticed.

But you reap what you sow, and the poor yield from a misspent life is starting to haunt David. If that isn't enough, fate then deals him a cruel blow, whilst coincidentally, love from long, long ago brushes his shallow soul again, rekindling emotional yearnings that had once touched his young heart.

With life's central vanishing point looming ever closer, he embarks on a poignant one-way journey in search of romantic hopes and dreams – one that will take him into another dimension. The Fifth Dimension of Love.

About the Author: Aged seven, Julian Bonser wrote a simple poem and won a prize – a whopping one guinea. With this he bought a Bakelite woodwind recorder, which he dropped and broke. And his burgeoning literary career took a 50-year sabbatical. Now armed with memories, experiences, creative skills, imagination and a determination to put them to practical use, he's back to writing.
